

Plasmapheresis.

Plasmapheresis is a procedure developed by Grifols in 1951.

It is an established and safe technique that separates plasma from other blood components (red blood cells, platelets and other cells), which are injected back into the plasma donor during the donation process. It is currently the most widely used technique for collecting plasma from donors for therapeutic purposes.